

Syllabus for
PSY 354--History and Systems of Psychology
3 Credit hours
Spring 2012

I. COURSE DESCRIPTION

A study of major systems of psychology in historical perspective, with a view to discovering relationships between theory and empirical data.

Prerequisite: PSY 201

At least two other courses in psychology desirable and the humanities sequence.

This course endeavors to round out a Christian liberal education by a detailed knowledge of the major historical figures and movements involved in the history of the science of behavior. Attention is therefore given to the dual heritage of psychology from philosophy and physiology, and the important philosophical and moral issues involved.

II. COURSE GOALS

The student who successfully completes this course will have detailed knowledge of the history of this science, be able to articulate a Christian perspective on the history of this particular science, and have a grasp of the many issues involved in the study and applied practice of the science of behavior.

III. STUDENT LEARNING OUTCOMES FOR THIS COURSE

The student who successfully completes this course will be able to do the following:

- A. Identify and articulate the premises and philosophical assumptions upon which contemporary psychology is based.
- B. Cite and evaluate the major historical events, ideas, and movements that shaped and gave rise to contemporary psychology.
- C. Identify the major historical figures who made important contributions to the development of psychology.
- D. Articulate and take an informed Christian position on the enduring questions, issues, and dilemmas that have plagued humanity throughout the histories of philosophy and psychology.
- E. Identify and take an informed Christian position upon the special problems associated with psychology as science applied to humanity.
